How new is news?

Representative democracy emerged from a slow flow of information between the public and the government. Elected representatives were dependent on the public, in part because they were the source of information. The earliest American newspapers reproduced "intelligence" gathered through their harbours, information that had occurred months earlier at some distance. The phenomenon is remarkable, given the geography of the thirteen original colonies, that they could consider themselves as having collective knowledge. According to Anderson's terms, an "imagined" community is one that papered itself against distant European powers.
